13s STORY

BY NATHAN STRAUSS

It's a rainy week in Myrtle Beach, which forces teams off the field during times they would otherwise have been practicing their defense or taking batting practice. Some players try to nap in their locker stalls, others call their family or watch videos on their phones. The majority of the action, though, is focused around the card table at the center of the room.

Clubhouse games are the stuff of legends. From college clubhouses all the way up to the pros, each team has different ways to keep themselves busy when not on the field. For some, it might be poker, dominoes, or blackjack. Other teams bring Monopoly boards around. For the 2023 Augusta GreenJackets, though, the game of choice is quite simple: 13.

13, also known as "Tien Len," or Vietnamese for "struggling upstream," serves a number of purposes for the GreenJackets. It's a four-person game, with each round lasting no more than 10 minutes. Oftentimes, there will be a waiting list to get into games, with the players finishing third and fourth forced off the table.

I first got introduced to the game on the first afternoon of the road trip. GreenJackets catcher Nick Clarno needed a fourth person to play, and I was in the vicinity. Before I knew it, I was thrown headlong into a week-long intensive in the art of 13.

The game itself functions similarly to hearts, spades, or euchre. Each player gets 13 cards, and the goal is to get all of your cards out. You can play one card, a pair, three-of-a-kind (known as trips), or a run of three or more cards (think 9-10-Jack-Queen-King). You have to play cards to beat what the previous person played, matching the type of play they used; for example, if the previous person played a pair of fours, you would have to play a pair of fives or a higher pair.

Over the course of the week, I counted 14 different people who played at the table, myself included. “We have a really big group of guys,” said Clarno. “You can really see people’s personalities during these games.”

Clarno was right. Jason Franks, who graduated from Cal Poly with a civil engineering degree, was often the most tactical, leading to long win streaks. The midwestern-raised Spencer Schwellenbach showed his card-playing mettle, keeping a level head. Some players also relished the opportunity to compete against the players who normally wear the same jersey. The feisty Clarno and his roommate E.J. Exposito often focused more on beating each other, even if it came at the cost of overall success around the table. Landon Harper, played the role of general antagonist, trying to disrupt as many tactics as possible.

You can’t play card games without table talk. Some players brag about their hands, some undersell what they have, but all are there to have fun. Frivolous arguments also spring up - Harper proclaims that he could handle himself in a one-on-one against an NBA player, Exposito is vehement that New York City is the best city in the world - but as the winners stay on and losers get replaced, the whole table becomes something of a revolving door.

“At the end of the day, baseball is getting better at bringing more types of people together. Not just from a diversity standpoint, but also recognizing that some guys are quieter, some are more social, and that people should be encouraged to spend their downtime however they want,” says Clarno.

And that is the true beauty of 13: it is inclusive. It’s quick to learn, quick to play, features as many people as are willing to wait, and there’s no skill curve, meaning even the least experienced can get good quick. Whereas poker games in old-time locker rooms might have come at a financial cost, these games are just a chance to spend more time with the teammates. And what could be better than that?
