TAKING STOCK OF THE BRAVES' FARM SYSTEM IN 2025

Perennially underrated and undervalued on a national level, the Minor League system of the Atlanta Braves has taken significant strides forward this summer, leading to high levels of optimism entering 2026.

For more than just the beautiful park and smiling fans, Augusta has received the lion's share of focus from prospect watchers and evaluators, as both high pedigree talent and emerging young stars have funneled through SRP Park. The rotation, always the centerpiece of the GreenJacket roster, has dazzled despite heavy turnover early in the year. Top prospect Cam Caminiti, ranked #1 in the organization nearly across the board, made his way up in the beginning of June after a slow ramp up from injury and has looked the part, flashing four strong pitches with the potential to move quickly in 2026.

While Caminiti was a relatively known commodity, many arms that entered the year either with questions or without fanfare have taken strides as well. Third rounder Luke Sinnard returned from a second elbow procedure in two years and quickly overmatched Carolina League hitters, while seventh rounder Brett Sears continued the success that led to him earning Big 10 Pitcher of the Year in college, and has ran all the way to AAA in his first pro season.

In addition to the first year pros, a pair of young international arms have emerged as pitchers to watch over the next couple of years. Rayven Antonio and Jeremy Reyes, both of whom got a cup of coffee in Augusta at the end of last summer, have taken notable steps forward in 2025. Antonio has added velocity on two differing fastballs, and has parlayed that into being the most consistent arm for the Jackets. Reyes, meanwhile, has added command and a cutter to his arsenal, and has high strikeout numbers despite early health issues.

Two slightly unheralded draftees from 2024 have both commanded the middle of Augusta's order all year, as Owen Carey and Eric Hartman have announced themselves as pros in a big way. The two outfielders have both flashed strong contact and patience traits, with Carey leading the team in games played while Hartman has begun to tap into more power as the year goes on.

While Augusta has dominated much of the organizational attention, there have been stars at every level for those clever enough to look for them. In his first full season as a pro, outfielder Patrick Clohisy took High-A Rome by storm, and is now doing the same thing at AA Columbus to wrap up the year. In AA, infielder David McCabe returned from elbow surgery to create huge offensive output, with a recent promotion to AAA putting him on the precipice of the big leagues. At the top reaches of the system, Didier Fuentes became the first member of the 2024 GreenJackets to be called up to the Braves, and a series of mechanical changes for 2023 first-rounder Hurston Waldrep have the former Florida Gator starring in Atlanta down the stretch.

ERIC HARTMAN

Individual success has run rampant through the Braves system this summer, and the rush of recent additions via the 2025 Draft have infused even more talent and excitement. Players like Tate Southisene, Alex Lodise, and Cody Miller have all begun the first steps of their pro careers, with high ceilings on each of them. As some of the GreenJackets' top performers begin to move up the ladder, all eyes will turn to the 2026 roster to see which young players will emerge as future stars in the years to come.
