YOUNG PROSPECTS MAKING WAVES IN GREENJACKETS DEBUTS

As the 2024 season winds down, a series of roster moves over the final few weeks have lended a handful of opportunities at the full-season level for young players. With the 2024 MLB Draft having finalized in mid-July, and the Florida Complex League season ending a week later, there's been nowhere but Augusta to test unproven young players.

With twenty players signing out of the first-year player draft, and another four picking up undrafted free agent contracts, the organization as a whole has seen an influx of new blood. The Braves continued their trend of procuring pitching early, with 9 of the first 10 picks being arms, but talent on both sides of the ball have already touched down in Augusta from this year's draft class.

Atlanta's Day 3 of the draft yielded a handful of intriguing position players, but none have impressed more in the early stages than Patrick Clohisy. A left-handed hitting outfielder out of St. Louis University, the Braves snagged Clohisy in the 11th round as the first collegiate position player they selected this year. All Clohisy has done over his career is hit, including sporting an average over .380 in his final year with the Billikens. Pat has kept the bat hot at the pro level, reaching base in every single game played at the time of this writing.

While Clohisy has done the most damage at the plate, two other new hitters with ties to the Crimson Tide have found comfort quickly at the pro level. 14th round pick Colby Jones opted to sign with Atlanta rather than honor his commitment to Alabama, and it seems to have been the right decision. Jones combines plus speed and defense with solid bat control, and has looked good on the infield for the Jackets. Mac Guscette, Alabama's starting catcher this year who signed as a UDFA, has already surpassed Augusta, becoming the first member of this year's class to make it to High-A Rome after a promotion on Thursday, August 15th.

With so many pitchers selected this year by the Braves, it was only a matter of time until both the rotation and bullpen of Augusta got a boost. As of August 16th, none of the top 7 pitchers selected had touched down at SRP Park, but those who have made it have looked solid. 9th rounder Owen Hackman dealt with rainouts and time changes in his debut, but flashed solid potential as a strong right-hander. His fellow Day 2 draftee, Jacob Kroeger out of D2 Maryville University, has posted a pair of scoreless relief outings and shown flashes of brilliance from the left side.

The first new pitcher to earn a win came as a bit of a surprise, with undrafted free agent Jacob Gomez ending Augusta's skid by snaring a victory in relief in his pro debut. The undersized lefty out of Old Dominion is a traditional crafty lefty, but the movement garnered on all four of his pitches have kept righties and lefties alike off-balance. Gomez was one of two undrafted pitchers picked up by Atlanta, and so far the only one to debut, as Campbell's Derek Vartanian works his way back from injury.

Beyond the new draftees, the FCL's finalization means that young international prospects have earned promotions to the full-season level. Immediately after the All-Star break, outfielders Luis Guanipa and Junior Garcia, along with shortstop John Gi, all earned their way up the ladder. Each is 19 or younger, and have made significant strides in their short time in Augusta. The rotation has also seen young additions, with 18-year-olds Luis Arestigueta and Rayven Antonio both entering the mix to add intriguing profiles to the pool of starters.

At the Single-A level, the final six weeks of the season exist almost entirely for development purposes and building a foundation for future success. While the playoff chase rolls on for a few select teams, every organization is looking to see how their perceived prodigies play out in professional chances. While many of the most highly touted young athletes are still waiting in the wings for the Braves, those who have already arrived have shown a bevy of skills and abilities that should build excitement in both the short and long term.
